This is a request to change Liberal Studies from--in Contract terms--an "equivalent unit" to a department. It has a major, faculty lines (two to three, with one tenured), a director, an OIE budget (@11K), majors (@400), an advisor, full-time office staff, autonomous academic and personnel review procedures, and an office suite (thanks to CoSaM); it also administers several hundred thousand dollars in grants.

It is a crucial program that "interfaces" between the arts and sciences, on the one hand, and UCTE. on the other. Why the change? If it smells like a department, walks like a department, and behaves like a department, then it should be a department.

Functionally, what will this change effect? The director will become a chair; and the equivalent unit will leave limboland for department status. Budget does not change much since that is linked to HC and FfES, and those are relatively fixed in the college. Liberal Studies oversees and staffs its own course designators now and will continue to do so, while seeking agreements from other departments to staff their courses that LS students enroll in. Conceivably, either as an "equivalent unit" or a department, faculty may be added; but this conversion in status does not affect or regulate that decision.

Sincerely,

Robert S. Cichowski, Director
Liberal Studies Program
